

A.C.T! - I.O.W - R.W.E.

How to do it Right!

A central focus of learning is to read and to write and to think reflectively. In each of my classes we will practice Active Reading and Reflective Writing. Senior Current Issues uses IOW (Issues of the World) and AFN (Africa News Weekly) to take on global concerns. RWE (Real World Economics) will provide you a working insight into the real world of economics. And A.C.T! deals with our government and your actions in holding it accountable to its charter. These assignments will inspire you to actively and intelligently engage the subject in order to bring your thinking to a higher level. Consequently your insights will be more valid; your arguments will have more impact.

Please go below for a guideline to writing an effective reflection.

#1 - Article Identification

Write the name of the article that you are reflecting on. Provide the source, the date of publication, and the online link to that article.

#2 - 5 W's

Who, What, When, Where, Why

Finalize your format and provide brief information on the above five issues regarding your news source. A sentence or two for each topic works. What and Why might run a bit longer than the others - but no more than a paragraph. It might be easiest to do this part of the assignment last. If fulfill the rest of the requirements - this should be easy to do.

#3 - Quote

Select a Quote that in your opinion best characterizes the entire article. Note the quote and the author. If you are quoting the author of the article – note that he wrote the article. And then provide a paragraph or two on the relevance of that quote to the issue at hand and to the article. On IOW, ANW, and RWE reflections I provide a one grade bonus for what I think are superior Quote and summaries.

#4 - Summary

In paragraph form, explain exactly what occurred in the article. Use your own words, but make sure that you are thorough in your expression. Three to five paragraphs.

#5 - Reflection

How does your group feel about this article? Talk about it. Summarize the various feelings that each of your participants have here. Be opinionated. Hopefully, the information gained and dialogue exchanged will strengthen the resolve that you have for your own cause. You should be able to write three to five solid paragraphs on your take. You may pose the discourse in the first person, in which case your opinion is “I”. You may speak for the group and define your opinion as “We”. You may even separate out and define each individual take on the issue – identifying the person in the group and what each member thinks. Make sure that you provide depth to the opinion piece. The key here is that this thing runs deeper than mere opinion - that it not only says something about the article, but also about how the piece filters through your thoughts and experience.

#6 - Q & A

Your final requirement is to ask a solid question that encapsulates the entire article. Then answer that question in a couple of paragraphs. Your question and answer should be insightful to the article and provide proof that you have a grasp of the issues brought forth in the article. On IOW, ANW, and RWE reflections I provide a one grade bonus for what I think are superior Q & A's.

#7 - Active Reading

Make that news article BLEED. Read it thoroughly, with the idea of the written assignment in mind. Ask yourself questions. Make comments. Draw stars, circles, pictures, exclamation points - anything to remind you of the specifics that matter most in the article. Your combined actively read articles will count the equal of one ACT Reflection for grading purposes.

FINAL THOUGHTS

Make sure as you search for news articles that you take your time. Don't go google the first thing that you come across. You may choose a weak article which will then make your reflection more difficult to do and ultimately less effective. Dig for good news, informative news, articles that will widen your scope on the issue that you are supporting. In the end, these articles must serve as your knowledge base for further research and correspondence. Nothing will impact your knowledge of the issue and your grade more positively than the selection of an interesting (to you) article for evaluation.

The key, remember, is not the grade ...it is to change the World!
